

A-Z of job roles & eligibility for criminal record checks

About this A-Z

1. This A-Z sets out the levels of criminal record check often required for different jobs and roles.
2. Not all employers carry out a formal criminal record check. Where they do, the level of check will depend on the specific role.

For people with convictions

- The level of criminal record check will determine what details about your criminal record will be disclosed.
- For roles involving basic checks, only unspent convictions are disclosed.
- For roles involving standard and enhanced checks, both unspent and spent convictions are disclosed, unless they are now filtered (or protected as is technically known).
- If you believe that an employer is requesting the wrong level of check, visit our section on ineligible checks for information on raising this as a query with the DBS.
- We have further guidance on criminal record checks for employment on our self-help information site.

For employers

- The level of criminal record check you can carry out will depend on the specific role that you are recruiting for.
- It is important that you undertake the correct level – it is a criminal offence to knowingly carry out a level check that the role is not entitled to.
- This A-Z only gives an indication as to level of check. We have further guidance on carrying out the correct level of check on our website for employers.

University lecturer	Basic	DBS position (May 2017) - Higher education establishments are not specified in SVGA as they are not 'wholly or mainly' for the full time education of children so they would be relying on the regulated activities set out in SVGA. As a general rule, universities do not have under 18s attending courses on a regular basis. This means that they would not fall under regulated activity – even if they have visiting 6th formers for a day they are unlikely to meet the period condition. However, if a university can evidence that an under 18 has been enrolled on the course then the teaching and pastoral staff they come in to contact with (in line with the period condition) would be eligible for an enhanced check.
